Designed for the open Atlantic, Grady-White boats have gained a loyal following on the Great Lakes, where boaters appreciate their big water capabilities and thoughtful appointments.

Grady-White raised a lot of eyebrows when the company unveiled its 37-foot Freedom 375, the largest outboard-powered dual console to date. Befitting Great Lakes tastes, it's a versatile boat that's equally at home taking the gang out fishing, pulling the kids on a tube, or enjoying a sunset cruise — all in the same day, if you like.

This kind of adaptability requires innovative engineering, which the Freedom 375 has in abundance. Take the brilliant fiberglass top, for example, which houses stereo speakers, integrated fishing rod storage, a cockpit sunroof, a retractable sunshade that extends back over the aft cockpit, and even an optional, fold-down, flat screen TV. The roomy bow offers comfortable seating for six or more, with a full wrap-around lounge seat surrounding a pair of D-shaped stowable tables — an arrangement that allows full access forward or rearward with the tables in place. A stereo remote and plug-ins for cell phone charging are nice touches.

The spacious cabin inside the portside console offers a pair of 80-inch bunks, plush bench seat, cedar-lined closet, folding table and storage. Opposite, an air conditioned head compartment with shower is neatly concealed within the helm console.

In the main cockpit, a double-wide helm seat sits in front of a standard kitchen/wet bar, complete with refrigerator, sink and a 1,300-watt grill. To port, a deluxe, L-shaped companion bench seat with removable table makes a comfy place to unwind. The open stern is built for fishing, with a 208-quart insulated fish box and 30-gallon livewell (optional). Or deploy the extra-large, fold-away aft bench seat to provide additional seating here.

"This boat is the culmination of everything we learned about what customers want in a boat that can cruise, fish and play for at least three seasons of the year," says Shelley Tubaugh, Grady-White vice president of marketing. "The Freedom 375 combines superb engineering, creative functionality and luxurious details." ★
