Navigating in Unfamiliar Waters

There was a time when every car had a map and every boat had a chart. As Global Positioning System (GPS) displays became a standard feature, maps and charts have become somewhat obsolete. In fact, many of today's boaters wouldn't be able to read a chart even if they had one. But what if your GPS display was not operational? Would you be able to get from point A to point B? If traveling by car, it might be easy to pull over and ask for directions, but in open waters, the fish aren't going to point the way home. You might be thinking, "I'll always have my GPS." But are you sure? Here are some ways you can prepare, just in case the unexpected happens.

The Mental Health Benefits of Boating

In this fast-paced, connected world, we're all looking for a little peace. Isn't it great to know our boats provide the perfect outlet to relax and unwind? It's a proven fact: spending time on your boat can improve your mental health. Associated with being on the water, Blue Mind is a state of mind that brings calm, peace, and well-being. That feeling can also be useful on land as one Grady owner learned when he faced treatment for cancer. Hear in his own words how reliving his best Grady moments got him through the treatments until he could get back on his boat again.
